Foreign policy is designed to facilitate the augmentation of national wealth and weighted based on the foreign economic strategy.

The basis of the external economic strategy are long-term direction of the macroeconomic. In the current context of globalization and further internationalization of the economic life of almost all regulatory measures states acquire the external effect. The pressure of international competition determines every aspect of public policy - by promoting industrial efficiency, agricultural subsidies to the education system and social services, so that questions positioning of each state depends on the set of the different areas of its strategy. The concentration in one area leads to the unstable position of the State in world economic relations, which negatively affects its existence.

As part of the «Concept of long-term socio-economic development of Russia until 2020.» Significant attention is paid to foreign economic politick, whose main objective in the long term is to create the conditions to achieve the leading position of Russia in world economic through effective participation in the international division of labor and enhancing the global competitiveness of its national economy [1].

Here are the main priorities of foreign economic policy:

1) ensuring a leading position in the country's high-tech world markets for goods and services in accordance with its specialization in the global scientific and technological sphere, including nuclear technology, aircraft equipment, shipbuilding, space services, and space vehicles, software, travel, and educational intellectual services;

2) the achievement of competitiveness of production of manufacturing industries and services, export promotion by the establishment of mechanisms of complex export support, including the identification and removal of barriers to access goods and services to foreign markets, the transformation of Russia into one of the main participants in the world's agricultural markets of grain, vegetable oil, flax and other goods [2];

3) the integration of Russia into the global transport system and implementation of transit potential of the Russian economy, including a large part of the reorientation of trade flows between Europe and Asia on Russian transit routes by improving the competitiveness and attractiveness of its transport corridors [3].

The main indicators to achieve the strategic goals are the following specific quantitative indicators:

- increasing the share of Russia in the world economy with 3.2 % of global gross domestic product;
- an increase in Russian exports;
- an increase in exports of engineering products;
- an increase in exports of transport services.
